

The annual snake hunt at Popperton with Judge and Mrs. Powers the leading spirits, was a small, select and informal affair which claimed attention on St. Patrick's day. Owing to the frost in the ground the hunt was rather unsuccessful, only forty-two scalps being counted up to sundown, when refreshments were served.

A supplementary affair of large proportions will be given about the last of May, and the Judge expects all friends to assist in driving the reptiles from the tulip patch.

Society is indebted to Billy Igleheart and Joe Priest for a pleasing innovation, and one which will become universally popular at a single bound. Did you notice during the Fiske performance, after the second act I think, that Billy and Joe exchanged wives with one another, until the fall of the final curtain, meeting at the door afterward in time to escort their ladies home. That's the best stunt of the winter, and while it may have been thought of before where possibly the family ties are not so strong as in the case cited, no one has been daring enough to do it, for Salt Lake is so small you know.

Mr. and Mrs. D. W. McAllister are now receiving their friends in the cosy home they recently purchased at 135 P street.

Mr. and Mrs. M. J. Kennedy are rejoicing in the arrival of a cunning addition to the family.

I have received the following in a handwriting that strongly resembles that of a famous female divine, says Town Topics:

When Senator Smith to Washington comes,
They'll greet him with positive glee;
And loudly tattoo on their bass social drums,
And ask him to dinner and tea.
A novelty surely never amiss,
So hail to him when he arrives,
With his one little, two little, three little, four little,
Five little Mormon wives.

"What do you think of the Mormon doctrine of plural marriages?"

"I think it's singular."

"Your reply makes it paradoxical."—Polly Pry.

A DOMESTIC TRAGEDY.

"I must have it."

There was a look of adamant sternness and inexorable determination on his face.

"George, I cannot. I will consent to anything else in the world; but not that."

Her face was almost livid with emotion, as she gazed at him with pleading eyes that still retained a flash of defiance.

The man was unmoved by the suffering of the woman before him. As he stood there in the fading light, he looked as if he might have been chiseled in granite.

"I must have it," he said in the same acrid, implacable tone.

"Then here it is," she said in a voice scarcely audible.

And with a dexterous yet graceful movement she handed him his pipe and tobacco, the smoking of which in the living room she had expressly prohibited but a moment before.
